t be said that representative Montomery audiences are somewhat peuliar in showing their appreciation. When an offering is really enjoyed, there is no great outburst of applause, those present seem to want to keep the picture intact without the customary curtain calls. But paradoxical as it may seem, Mr. Wilson was called before the curtain to make a delightful little talk. Its originality was also appreciated by the audience. The curtain rises on the picture of a hall in an English baronial castle. the tapestries, the old armor brightened with scrubbing,- the huge fireplace, the high ceiling-and several medern individuals sitting playing cards at a little table.
